COUNTY SEAT

PONTIAC, MICHIGAN 48341-1048

EARLY FACTS OF OAKLAND COUNTY

The first settlers, consisting of James Graham and son, Alexander Graham, Christopher Hartsogh, and John Hersey, came to the township of Avon in 1817.

Stephen Mack, active agent of the Pontiac Company, came to Pontiac in 1818, and the plan of the original city of Pontiac was then laid.

According to the plan, the lots on each of the four corners, formed by the intersection of Huron and Saginaw Streets, were to be devoted to public or semi-public purposes.

The state of Michigan was surveyed and laid off into sections of one mile square and to numbered townships, as nearly as might be, six miles square. The county of Oakland was established by Proclamation of Governor Cass January 12, 1819, to consist of the twenty-five surveyed townships which at present constitute this county. John L. Leib, Charles Larned, Phillip LaCuer, John Whipple and Thomas Rowland, Jr., were appointed commissioners to report to the Governor "the most eligible site for seat of justice."

History records a very active agitation regarding the establishment of the county seat. Auburn was the chief competitor of the city of Pontiac. According to the Auburnites of that day, the final session of the commissioners at which it was decided that Pontiac should be the county seat was a rather noisy and, as they claim, bibulous affair.

March 28, 1820, the county of Oakland was formally established and Pontiac named "the seat of justice."

January 28, 1828, Oakland county was divided into two townships—the lower ten surveyed townships, constituted the township of Bloomfield, and the remaining fifteen, the township of Oakland.

September 10, 1822, the counties of Lapeer, Sanilac, Saginaw, Shiawassee were laid out and attached to Oakland county for judicial and civil purposes. Within the limits of the above named territory, now lie the counties of Lapeer, Sanilac, Tuscola, Huron, Genesee, Saginaw, Shiawassee, parts of Livingston, Ingham, Midland and Bay—an area of about seven thousand square miles.

April 12, 1827, Oakland County was divided into five townships—Farmington, five surveyed townships in the southwest; Troy, what is now known as townships of Royal Oak and Troy; Bloomfield, the present township of Bloomfield, West Bloomfield and Southfield; Oakland, five surveyed townships in the northeast and east Pontiac, ten in the northwest and the present township of Pontiac.

After this date, further subdivision of the county followed rapidly, the last being the townships of Addison, Brandon and Rose, in 1837.

The first courthouse and jail, combined, consisted of squared logs on the present courthouse site. The lower part, was a jail, and the upper part, a courthouse. This was erected about 1823. In 1835, the grand jury found the building was of little use. From 1835 to 1846, the question of a new jail and courthouse was a common source of discussion by the board of supervisors. In 1846, a jail building was built on the lot for many years used for jail purposes across the alley from the present courthouse.

The agitation for a new courthouse began in 1851 and raged through the year until 1856 when a new courthouse was erected, built of brick, which continued until the present courthouse was built.
