OAKLAND COUNTY'S BEGINNINGS

(By Mrs. Donald E. Adams, President, Oakland County Pioneer & Historical Society)

It was St. Patrick's day in 1817. James Graham, aged 68, his wife, Mary Van De Mark Graham, his sons, Alexander and Benjamin, his daughter and her husband, Christopher Hartsough, and possibly John Hersey, together with other members of their families, had completed a journey through the wilderness. From Mt. Clemens they had traveled along the Clinton River until they reached an attractive site on the shore of Paint Creek. It was here in what is today Rochester that they erected, one hundred fifty years ago, the first log house in the County of Oakland.

After serving in the Revolutionary War, James Graham had moved to Canada from Pennsylvania, and then, in 1816, he returned to the United States, settling in Mt. Clemens. Maybe the Grahams had not heard earlier surveyors' reports that the interior of Michigan was an impenetrable swamp and not suited for settlement; or perhaps they wanted to see for themselves. At any rate, one of the sons, Benjamin, is said to have taken employment as a government surveyor. He learned at first hand during the summer of 1816 that there was desirable land in Detroit's hinterland. In the spring of 1817 he led his family to its new home.

It was not long before others followed. Land lookers soon were checking various parts of the county. Some prominent Detroit citizens took a tour and reported their findings in the Detroit Gazette for November 13, 1818. They spent twelve days exploring the "interior of this Territory". When they came to lakes which to their knowledge had no names they named them for themselves or their friends. Among those which retain these names are Wing, Cass and Elizabeth (for Mrs. Lewis Cass). They reached the following conclusion:

"On the whole, with respect to the lands over which we travelled...it may be said that a very considerable proportion are excellent, that most of them are good, and that the poorest section of them might be cultivated for profit. Good water is another important article, and we are able to say that we found it in great abundance. ...as to seats for mills, there will be no want, one may be found in every neighborhood."

Others like Oliver and Alpheus Williams and their wives made a personal tour of exploration before deciding to move into the county. B. O. Williams, son of Oliver, told of the trip, made also in 1818:

"Early in the month of September of that year, my father and mother, uncle and aunt, with two gentlemen friends, all on horseback, with a French guide, followed the Saginaw Indian trail out into the section now called Oakland County. These two ladies were then considered to be the first English speaking American women who ever voluntarily slept in the back woods of Michigan. After reaching the lake country north and west of Pontiac, finding those beautiful plains covered with a luxuriant growth of grass and flowers, splendid open forests free from underbrush, abounding with deer and birds, the lakes alive with fish, and covered with water fowls, all so tame as scarcely to fear the presence of man; the little party fairly clapped their hands with joy for having found a place so beautiful for their homes."

Reports such as these, plus a more liberal land sale policy, resulted in what might be called a fairly rapid increase in population. Lands were purchased almost concurrently in what were to become the townships of Avon, Waterford, Pontiac, Bloomfield, Troy, Orion, Oakland and Royal Oak. By 1820 the census recorded 59 heads of households and 330 persons. Five years later there were 282 houses and 47 barns in the entire county. The year 1825 saw the completion of the Erie Canal, and then began a steady increase which has been the lifetime pattern for our county.
