National observance of civil defense week is doing much to focus attention on the fact that civil defense is essentially a grass roots movement built a round the family, In this we see the completion of a full circle in one phase of our national life. In colonial times there were few jurisdictional worries, If a man's home was attacked by Indians, he and his family had to fight for their lives, with what help they could get from the neighbors. No home could feel that war was something for the Army to worry about. War was too close, too personal. The same was true of natural disasters. There was no multitude of Federal agencies to fight the hurricanes or floods and to provide relief. Danger was an individual, a family, a community challenge.

With the evolution of our of specialization and delegation. There was a trend of responsibility out of the family and the community. Certain benefits derived from giving the government responsibility for our problems, but inevitably we sacrificed something in self-reliance. War and disaster were among the things delegated to the specialists.

Americans felt the impact of war in the tragically multiplying crosses in national cemetries, but the awful destruction of war came no closer than the movie screen. War, for us, was for export only.

Natural disasters, on the other hand, became more personal. Two centuries ago a flood could wipe out a town and, in time, a new one could be built elsewhere. A flood today imperils many millions of dollars worth of factories, homes and transportation facilities which have been carefully located for maximum efficiency. Yet, if natural disasters, because of their costliness and dislocating effect on the entire nation, have required an organized defense, they also have demanded increasing concern and participatin by the individual citizen. So today we find the ranks of local civil defense organizations, Red Cross and relief organizations of all kinds swelled by an increasing number of volunteers. Two factors have brought this about: the magnitude of the effect of disaster on our economy; and the fact that they strike home at the individual citizen, his family, his job, and his savings. These very same factors are operating today to bring war
