SPEAKING

City officials are huddling with a financial consultant this week to determine the feasibility of selling revenue bonds for the purpose of improving Northville's water system. Almost immediately the city must develop its newly found well site near Baseline and Novi road and also provide new lines with adequate pressure to serve the new high

Along with this project goes the installation of pumping Very soon - quite possibly to be considered in the same bonding project - the city must replace many of its old water lines, provide elevated water storage facilities and

Just how much can be handled under a revenue bond ssue remains to be seen. The consultant, an expert in the field of engineering and financing of such projects, must first tell the council how much money the city can expect to raise from the revenues of its water system. The next step is to determine just how far to go with the overall water program at this time and, how much the undertaking will

In the past year the council has strived to put the water department on a paying basis, completely independent from the city's general fund. Everyone, including the city itself, now pays for water. In the past churches and several other organizations had been given water free of charge. This private-business-like handling of the water department is standard procedure in most communities and a definite requirement for a municipality wishing to issue bonds on the revenues of the water system.

Councilmen prefer the revenue bond procedure rather than a general obligation bond. In the first place a revenue bond does not pledge the faith of the community; secondly, it provides for payment of the improvements by the users of the system. In other words, any surplus derived from system in the form of payment for the improvements.

The council expects to learn this week whether or not its water department can support a bond issue. Then the question: how much? Time is also an important factor, for even a bonding program started now would take six months to initiate. Actually, the city does not have this much time and will be forced to start the project without bond funds.

As we see it, however, the council has made a very important, though long-delayed, decision. They have chosen a road to follow and, presumably, when it is decided that the time has arrived for sewer improvements, they will again look to the system to support the project through revenue

Finally, of course, non-revenue producing projects, such as streets or possibly city hall facilities, will have to be undertaken through general obligation bonds. But in the meantime, the more important projects are being met without indebtness to the city.

Although this happened earlier in the summer, we can't pass up mentioning the teaching ability of Meadowbrook's Andy Bertoni. The popular greenskeeper took his sons, John and Jim, out on the course for a few pointers. At the par three thirteenth he showed them exactly how it was done with a hole-in-one, his first!
